Choosing the right partner can be a very difficult decision in entering into a relationship. Whether one is looking for a lover, an insurance company, the best college education, or a business partner --- one's choice of a partner has to lead to getting the best deal for you. In this day and age, we can't help but be highly cautious and and downright discriminating.

Even businesses and big companies are engaged in laborious searches for good partners. Large companies in the US have been tempted and are now actually utilizing a new "partnering" technology that has become part of the business world. According to Wikipedia.com, this new partnering scheme refers to the delegation of the non-core operations from internal production to an external entity specializing in the management of that operation. Whoah! To simplify this description, this is a strategic management model of transferring business processes to another company. The concept, which began to be adopted by many companies during the 1980s, is about delegating the management or even the day-to-day execution of one or more business functions to a third party service provider. This method is called "outsourcing".

Outsourcing occurs when a company uses an outside firm to provide a necessary business function that might otherwise be done in-house. Its aim is mostly to make an organization more competitive by staying focused on its core competencies. The decision to outsource is often made in the interest of lowering firm costs, redirecting or conserving energy directed at the competencies of a particular business, or to make more efficient use of labor, capital, technology and resources. Outsourcing companies are doing good businesses and creating massive employment in India, the Philippines, Singapore and some parts of Europe.
