Fun Packed Flat

Flatshare in London needn't be a daunting situation. It can be a great way to meet new people and a cost effective way to live in the City. Flatshare in London is now an extremely popular choice for many young professionals who otherwise may not afford the ever increasing costs of living in the nation's capitol.

The History of Flats

The word 'flat' actually denotes to a suite of rooms in a larger building and comes from the Scottish word 'flaet', meaning a floor, or a storey.

Although people have lived in houses or separate dwellings practically since records began, flatshare in London is a relatively new concept.

Historically, even though extended families may, at times, have lived in the same home, they will always have been connected by blood or marriage.

It's only fairly recently, that unconnected people have lived permanently under the same roof and its only really when high-density housing was needed, mainly in urban areas that the kind of communal residential buildings we now know as flats, came into existence.

Flat Living Becomes Stylish

As the twentieth century progressed, more people in London started living in flats and flatshare due to lack of space and growing property prices.

Prevailing attitudes towards flat living and flatshare in London only started to improve in the mid-1990s, when ever smarter and trendier apartment blocks began to be constructed and larger houses were converted into flats and flatshare in London really began to take off. The buy-to-let phenomenon, plus advances in building technology, meant that flats and the concept of flatshare in London were finally becoming highly desirable and in many cases, more desirable than houses.

Choosing the right flatshare

Maybe even more important than choosing the right flatshare in London is choosing the right flat mate to live with. Flatshare in London can be a lot of fun but finding a flat or house mate is difficult and getting it wrong can be a nightmare. Whether you choose to live with friends, family, a loved one or strangers is up to you, and totally depends on your situation. However, if you are careful and take your time finding the right flatshare in London then you can't go too far wrong.

Finding Someone to Live With

If you have decided to try a flatshare in London and don't want to live with your friends or family, then you might want to consider finding strangers for a house share or flat share in London. This can be a daunting prospect, but sometimes living with people you don't already know can be easier. When embarking on any flatshare in London you need to be careful about the people you choose to share with. Set up a meeting in a social setting to see if you get on and share common ground and similar interests.

A successful Flatshare in London

Finding the right person or group of people to house share or flat share in London with is tough, and in many ways is more important than finding the right property. However, if you are honest with the people you are going to live with in your flatshare in London then things should work out well. Make sure that you all learn to compromise and that everyone is prepared to pay his or her own way and do a share of housework. The key is to respect each other's way of living and to flatshare in London with people you can really get on with.
