

Work Accident - Claim Compensation - The Procedure

If you suffer an accident at your workplace, you are eligible to claim for work accident compensation. Of course, the accident must not be your fault. Usually, in these cases, the ones who your claim will be directed against will be your employers.

Work accident compensation can be requested when: your workplace environment is not safe (there's no proper heating and ventilation, lighting, etc); your equipment is inadequate; your training was missing or incomplete; your colleagues' training was incomplete. Usually, most of the claims are filed because an accident happened for one of the above mentioned reasons.

You may have second thoughts when filing a claim against your employers. You may fear that you will lose your job and your colleagues will all be against you. However, you should know that all employers have insured themselves for exactly this type of situation: an accident at work. Cases of victimization are very rare.

An industrial accident can have serious traumatic effects, and you may even lose your ability to go to work. If this is the case, your work accident compensation will be a huge one, which will have to cover the rest of your life.

When you decide you want to file your claim and get your work accident compensation, the first thing you need to do is contact a specialized attorney. You won't have difficulties in finding a good one, as there are many companies which have expert lawyers willing to help you. In this type of personal injury, the big chance is that your lawyer will take your case on a no win no fee basis.

The no win no fee arrangement is a procedure that allows you to pay your lawyer with the condition of him winning the case. So, basically, if your solicitor doesn't win your case, he doesn't get his financial reward for representing you. Under a no win no fee arrangement, a lawyer has two fees: the basic fee and the success fee.

The basic fee is a pre-determined fee and as the case is riskier, it is higher. The success fee is optional, and it is a percentage out of the basic fee. The good news is that your attorney's fees will probably be have to be pain if not entirely, at least partially, by your opposition.

However, watch out for the scenario in which you lose the case. If that happens, you will have to pay your opponent's fees. They may be as high as a few thousand pounds. However, there's a solution to this problem: the after the event insurance. It is especially designed for these situations and it should cover the hazards of losing the case.

Usually, unless your accident was really serious, your case will not require a lawsuit. Your attorney will have managed to gather as enough compelling evidence as he possibly could. In the face of this evidence, your opposition will have nothing left to do than to accept defeat.

You must understand the following thing: this is not a matter of you looking for ways of getting rich. Because you probably won't. It is about getting the financial freedom you need in order to make a fast recovery. Or, at least, the fastest possible. Nobody has the right to toy with your life. An accident can be a very traumatic event, and you need help in the process of leaving it behind. Also, by filing a claim, you may also help other people from not getting injured in the future. You may even save lives, because your employers will have to mend the things that led to your accident. This is just another reason why you should get your work accident compensation.
