

Happy Thanks-Christmas Easter

I noticed many of the malls and major department stores planned to open their doors to early Christmas shoppers beginning at midnight after Thanksgiving dinner. It seems every merchant retailer is in an all-out race to be the first to open their doors to holiday shoppers. I can almost see the future of the Christmas shopping season. Of course this is only my vivid imagination running wild, but still it merits some consideration. Per example; some retail outlets will probably start by offering a free Thanksgiving day dinner to the first 200 shoppers waiting in line when they open their doors at noon and then officially start the shopping season at 1 pm. I suppose they will give these first 200 lucky customers a couple of hour's head start over the rest of the patrons waiting for the doors to officially open. Wait a minute! Here come the Internet retailers to the rescue. Online customers will be given the same sale offerings as the regular stores only they will be spared the seemingly endless agonizing hours of standing in long check-out lines, but still receive the same discount bargains and best of all the merchandise will be delivered directly to their front doors. A tip for all of you that like to shop early anyway; why not buy your Easter outfits while you are in the store? I guess I'm being a bit absurd here, but where does it end?
www.waynebryant.info

About the Author

I'm a down-to-earth kind of guy who also enjoys a stroll on the wild side of life every once in a while. www.waynebryant.info

Source: <http://www.tntarticles.com>