

Admission to Ivy League and Other Top Colleges: Mission Possible

There are various ways to prepare for the college admissions process, some of which start well before the junior year of high school. Participating in extracurricular activities is a very good way of preparing for college, especially given the fact that admissions committees are usually interested in more than just the student's academic performance and achievements; when reviewing an applicant, they are interested in the whole student. Furthermore, participation in community life can have a positive impact not just on the committee's decision, but also on the student's life. However, failure to engage in such activities prior to high school years does not mean that the college admission process is compromised. Still, in the junior year of high school, you should choose your courses wisely as required for admission to college. Deciding on what college to go to as early as the junior year of college is rather difficult. However, a student who wants to continue his or her education should make sure that he or she opts for advanced courses providing solid college preparation.

Preparing for admission to college is a complex process, as it encompasses many aspects. The most important of these are the standardized tests and the admissions essay. There are many colleges that have low admission scores and give more importance to essays, letters of recommendation or other specific requirements. However, if you aim at being admitted to one of the top colleges, such as the Ivy League colleges, you must do very well on your standardized tests.

The reputation of the Ivy League colleges precedes them, and for good reason. The benefits of an Ivy League education are undeniable, but they do come at a certain cost. The tuition you pay is rather high, and so is the competitiveness of admissions. But admission, education and graduation from an Ivy League college means a very strong point in your resume, access to prestigious alumni networks, prestigious awards, and competitive graduate programs. However, given the high tuition fees, the high test scores, the anxiety over admissions and the low acceptance rate, it wouldn't be a bad idea to broaden your research and find a top admissions counselor.

Admission to one of the Ivy League colleges or to other top colleges must be carefully planned and prepared. It is highly advisable that all students who want to be admitted to one of the top colleges be well prepared for the standardized test, write a persuasive essay and prepare for a possible interview with the college admissions committee. The best way to achieve all these is to seek the help of highly trained admissions staff.

With the admissions process becoming more and more competitive each year, there is no guarantee that you will be admitted to one of the top colleges, even if your score is higher than the average. But a team of trained and experienced professionals can help you achieve your goal. You can attend SAT prep boot camps, benefit from assistance in writing your essay, and have a committee of trained staff review your application, highlight your weak points and assist you in making your application more competitive – all with the purpose of giving you confidence, raising your scores, making you more competitive, and maximizing your career earning potential.
